Aleister Crowley & the Black Arts: A Critical Study of the Religion of Gnostic Nazarene from the First to the Fifth - Saint Hilary of Poitiers, Patristic Scholar, The Source of the Tradition of the Twelve - Dignitatis Humanae Institute, The Aleister Crowley - O Livro De Thoth Paul Furlong, Aleister Crowley's Spontaneous Muse; Online from the UK; It is fair to say that Aleister Crowley was a great lover of the Dark Lady. Whereas most men would prefer a sweet, timid or the perfect embodiment of beauty, he thought that true beauty is in the eyes of the beholder. The Lady should be daring and passionate and strong, both mentally and physically, if she is to attract and enthral men. The orifices in the forehead and in the head are the spiritual entrance, from which the inspired think, and that which think is the Divine. The phallus of the spirit. Crowley realised that 'the Dark Lady must be a great sage; she must be the soul of the man, and no man's alone. She must be able to raise and lower the generative force; she must be the alchemist and worker of metals; she must understand the three; She must seek the four elements, and comprehend them. In this area, she is a great master. She must be the initiate who transcends sex, and who initiates in sex. The woman in sex is not yet completely awakened. She does not rule or save. And even if she is inspired by a man, she cannot give birth to a great work. She cannot give birth to the initiate. She can only nourish him. This shows that she does not represent the creative process, but is its instrument. She is not the dark, but the white light; not one, but the many. She is neither mother nor wife, but pure light. She is not the lover, but the lover. She is not the incarnation of woman, but the instrument of incarnation. She is not the Madonna, but the Mother. She is not the passive partner in sexual love, but the active principle. She is not her own mistress, but she is ruled by a sexless person, a lover of the Absolute, like this, the most impersonal love. The woman who is the Lord, without whom the man would be a lost soul, is necessarily a great and
