According to a new analysis of urban food waste, this item is indeed avoidable. The U.K. government is pushing to reduce household food waste, to prevent a climate catastrophe and to save money. How will it go about doing that? The idea of opening the front door to people who are hungry and living on the streets is a disturbing one. And I'm not the only one who considers it troubling. For example, But I think it's a pretty good idea. It might prove more effective than the idea of merely throwing some food away. This is one of those small, easy-to-miss articles that, if you need to know, can lead you to the biggest one. As I wrote in a recent post, we've known for years that more than $1 billion worth of food is thrown away by U.S. households each year. The new study shows the problem extends throughout the world, but is far worse in poor countries than in rich ones. The research paper, by agricultural economist Christopher Wolf and sociologist Zeinab Ahmed at the University of California, Berkeley, draws a link between food waste and poverty. They note that poor countries tend to waste more food because they don't have access to healthy, nutritious food, or to refrigeration or storage, and because they don't have the food processing infrastructure to make sure the food is fit for eating. And here's the pertinent paragraph: The bulk of food losses occur in the developing world, highlighting the possibility that better home food storage and transportation could reduce waste in these countries. Almost 10 percent of all food produced is wasted or lost, across the world. But in the developing world the figure is as high as 22 percent, the authors said. To put this in perspective, the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization estimates that roughly 40 percent of households in developing countries are suffering from food insecurity, including hunger. There are many reasons for this, including that many developing countries lack the infrastructure to supply food to the cities, or people can't afford to buy enough to feed their families, and food is wasted as people struggle
