Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a fabrication method of a print head, more specifically, a method of forming grooves in an electrode layer by an electrochemical process. 2. Description of the Prior Art The conventional print head has a plurality of heater electrodes to heat up ink for performing the printing operation. The electrodeposition printing process is widely used to make the heater electrodes. The electrodeposition printing process is also called as a plating process. This electrodeposition printing process has the following steps. A metal layer is first formed on a substrate, and then is patterned to form a plurality of heater electrodes. Next, the heater electrodes are heated for a long time to conductively adhere to the ink. The heater electrodes are further used to vaporize the ink. Finally, a gap between the heater electrodes is filled by a protective layer. U.
