A comparative study of the genomic organization and functional characterisation of the mouse Pgm3-1 and Pgm3-2 genes, located on the X-chromosome, is presented. The two Pgm3 gene segments show significant structural differences. The Pgm3-1 gene contains at least two introns. Its exon-intron organization shows substantial differences from that of the Pgm3-2 gene. Both genes seem to be transcribed from sense-strand RNA. The differences observed between the mRNAs produced by the two genes are discussed in the context of the hypothesis that PGM3 may be involved in the transport of phosphate in male germ cells. The level of expression of the Pgm3 genes differs between spermatogenic and somatic tissues. The present data confirm the earlier hypothesis that Pgm3 is active in spermatogenesis and suggest that PGM3 activity and the function of the Pgm3-1 gene product may be implicated in the transport of phosphate in male germ cells.

This book looks at gender as not only an essential component of identity formation but also as a social construction, which constitutes gendered categories. The chapters deal with the process of gender construction by analyzing the gender socialization and the impact of gender construction in European societies as well as in the United States and Japan. In each chapter, a feminist theory of gender socialization is adopted as a starting point and is applied to important social phenomena. The gender research, which the chapters employ, consists of examining gender relations in a variety of fields, such as kinship, family, education, work, health, politics, and sexuality. The literature regarding gender is also
