Hepatitis C virus (HCV) infection is a serious global health problem. The present invention relates generally to the field of animal behavior. More particularly, the present invention relates to a novel behavioral test apparatus for the measurement of pain behaviors in animals. The experience of pain is one of the most difficult problems in both human and veterinary medicine. Despite much progress, in all but a very few cases the diagnosis of pain is difficult because of the variability in the experience of pain. Most pain measurement techniques developed to date have been problem-oriented, but those methods have not been widely accepted for routine evaluation. These measurements include: behavioral signs, physiologic signs, stimulus evoked signs, and patient-reported outcome. The present invention provides a novel pain behavioral measurement technique. The present invention concerns an apparatus for measuring pain behavior in an animal. The pain behavior measurement apparatus comprises a test chamber for accommodating an animal to be measured. The test chamber has a first and second wall, and the walls have an inner surface that defines at least a chamber volume. At least one of the walls has a plurality of apertures extending therethrough to permit the animal to be accommodated within the chamber. The walls have a shape selected from a group consisting of a polygon, a circle, a sphere, an ellipsoid, and a geometrical shape composed of polygonal vertices. The apparatus also includes a sensor station for detecting a characteristic responsive to one of the animal's movement or motion to indicate pain behavior. The sensor station is located in a volume 3e33713323
