1. Field of the Invention
The present invention relates to a dental restorative material, and more particularly, to a dental restorative material which causes no foreign matter, stain or discoloration. 2. Description of the Prior Art A dental restorative material is used for filling a cavity of a tooth, filling a crown portion after a tooth restoration, protecting a bridge portion, etc. In such a dental restorative material, a combination of a silver compound and a glass powder is used. In the prior art, a silica powder is mixed and kneaded with a silver compound and a glass powder and a volatile solvent is added to the resultant kneaded composition. However, a problem is involved in the prior art dental restorative material in that it is difficult to control the amount of the volatile solvent to be mixed with the composition. When the amount of the volatile solvent is excessive, the composition is melted and separated into fine particles, thus being stained with the silver compound. When the amount of the volatile solvent is too small, a sufficient amount of the volatile solvent is not supplied to the
